Founder of Waye

Sinead Bovell is a futurist and founder of tech education company, WAYE. Every day over 10,000 Millennials and Gen Z's tune into Sinead's platforms to hear her take on technology and the future. In particular, her future forecasts on the ethical challenges of emerging technologies. Including her outspoken voice—and recent TEDx Talk—on the ethics of avatars.

She's been dubbed the A.I. educator for the “non-nerds” by Vogue Magazine; named one of Refinery 29's Top Ten Black Women Changing the Game alongside Naomi Osaka and Michaela Coel, hosted Wired Magazine's hit YouTube Series “What We Will Know,” and she is often quoted in press outlets, including the New York Times, CNN and ABC news, on the ethics and impacts of emerging technologies.

Sinead is a 7x United Nations speaker; has given formal addresses to presidents, royalty and Fortune 500 leaders on topics ranging from cybersecurity to artificial intelligence; she has interviewed some of the biggest names in technology—including Tristan Harris and Jonathan Haidt—on headlining topics, such as the future of democracy; and she currently serves as a strategic advisor to the United Nations International Telecommunication Union on digital inclusion.
